NAN'S WHITE WORLD. At our window on the bill, Sometimes talking, sometimes still, Sat my little girl and I, Looking on the wintry sky: While the breath of frosty air Swung the maples brown and bare, And across the valley rolled All the moonlight's wealth of gold neling with a wondrous glow What makes all the world so white? Of the moonlights and the cold. And the snowy world I told: Now the world seems whate to you. And the rays of wonder throw Only glory on the snow. Yet, beyond those mountains tall Long black shadows eastward fall, When my darling lies usleep.
O'er the world to se shadows creep. Soon enough the gold is lost In the shadow and the frost. But your father's arms divide Warmth within from cold outside, ong we can not linger still at our window on the hill; For your baby footsteps go
Soon enough across the snow,
By what trouble, at what cost,
Shall your own white world be lost? Prouble comes—oh, come it will some valley deep and chill; y what mountain, in what spot It shall meet you, know I not; By what shadows overeast Shall the glory go at last. When the shadows castward fall:-"Father, father," you may call: then the bitter tears shall rain You may call and call in vain.

In your trouble, if I bear,
I shall come and helpsyou, dear:
Though my lips be silent—though
Underneath the cruel snow; Though in vain you call to me Where your straying feet may be; Yet your Father watches still

AUNT NORA'S BIRTHDAY.
